The First World War saw the creation of Southend as a flying base - the first ever flight took off in 1915, when Flight Sub Lieutenant A.W. Robinson took up his Bleriot in an unsuccessful attempt to intercept a Zeppelin. During World War II the RAF operated from the airport fending off the Luftwaffe.

With peace declared, the airport was returned to civil ownership. This signalled a golden age for Southend, which saw Sir Freddie Laker base his famous Skytrain service in the town, alongside British United Air Ferries, for what became the world's busiest air route, Southend to Ostend. In the 1960's heyday Southend was the UK's third busiest airport and even had a starring role in the 1964 James Bond movie, Goldfinger.

The fortunes of London Southend Airport were radically altered in 2008 when it was purchased by Stobart Group – since then they have invested over £120 million in creating the UK's Best Airport (Which? Magazine) 2013 and 2014.
